on the doctrines of "active defence", "limited war under high technological conditions" and the creation of "rapid reaction combat units" with a focus on her periphery. The redefinition of China's "strategic frontiers", coupled with military modernisation programmes, are rapidly transforming the force projection capabilities of China's armed forces in the sea, air and on land. In recent years, China has also engaged in upgrading logistic and infrastructure facilities in the India-China border areas.

India's defence policy must take into account our complex security environment including this nuclear weapon and missile capability. China is also assisting Pakistan in its nuclear weapons programme and development of missiles. Defence relations between China and Myanmar also have a bearing on India's security.

R.M. in his recent press statements has reiterated our security concerns which have also been expressed by many leaders in the past and in various official documents.

Reacting to the reported statements of the R.M. the Chinese Ministry of Foreign Affairs commented that China does not pose any threat to any country. They said that the so called argument that China is the biggest threat to India is "absolutely ridiculous and not worthy of refutation".

In recent years there has been steady improvement in India-China relations. India believes that the five principles of peaceful coexistence, jointly enunciated by India and China, are of continuing relevance to the development of inter-State relations. Government of India remains committed to the development of a good neighbourly and mutually beneficial relationship with China. It also remains committed to seek resolution of all the issues with China through mutual consultations and dialogues.

All developments having bearing on India's security are constantly monitored and necessary measures are taken as required to maintain appropriate defence preparedness.
